TEST YOUR DUCK EGGS WITH THE LARGE END UP

All duck eggs should be tested at least twice during incubation, preferably on the seventh and fourteenth days, and the infertile eggs and those with dead germs removed. Dead germs in duck eggs decompose very rapidly, and are often detected by their odor.

Duck eggs having pure white shells are often tested as early as the fourth or fifth day, and the infertile eggs sold to bakers. Infertile eggs make good feed for ducklings, and can be used for cooking. The eggs are tested with the large end up, so that the size of the air cell may be seen, as well as the condition of the embryo duckling, specialists in the United States Department of Agriculture say. Testing should be done in a dark room.

The infertile egg when held before the tester will appear perfectly clear, much the same as a fresh egg, while a fertile egg will show a small dark spot known as the embryo, with a mass of little blood veins extending in all directions, if the embryo is living. If dead the blood settles away from the embryo toward the edge of the yolk, forming in most cases an irregular circle of blood known as a blood ring. The eggs containing strong, living embryos are dark and partly filled up after the fourteenth day, and show a clear, distinct line of demarcation between the air cell and the growing embryo, while dead germs show development only in part and lack this clear, distinct outline.

SHIPPING PROFITS DEPEND ON PACKING AND GRADING

Carelessness in grading, packing, and loading are largely responsible for the high percentage of rejections which occurs in the handling of fruits and vegetables, say marketing specialists of the United States Department of Agriculture.

Satisfactory compromises can be made only where both the shipper and the buyer are broad minded and willing to make reasonable concessions. A very common source of misunderstanding is shrinkage. A shipper who sends fruits or vegetables several hundred miles to market cannot understand why his shipment should weight so much less on arrival than it did at the point of origin. Thus the invoice weight of a car of bulk apples shipped from southwest Missouri on October 16, 1914, was 22,427 pounds. These apples arrived at market on October 23, and were re-weighed, barreled, and sold. The weight of the apples at destination was 17,971 pounds, indicating a loss of 4,456 pounds, or 19 per cent, due to shrinkage in transit and to the discarding of a small quantity of culls and spoiled fruit. Very few shippers could be made to believe that a legitimate loss as great as this could occur even though the shipment was graded and loaded carefully.
